CCV Story

I knew as soon as I graduated high school that I wanted to further my education. There was only one problem... I didn't have the slightest clue of what I wanted to do with said higher education. I was interested in psychology, criminal justice, English, women's studies, etc. I couldn't make up my mind on a single thing I wanted to do. I didn't want to go to an expensive college and dabble in different subjects and end up wasting a bunch of money on classes that wouldn't go towards a degree. Luckily I fell across CCV and found their liberal studies degree. It was very broad and allowed me to dabble in different subjects and still let them count towards my degree. I am now in my second semester and I am on my way towards getting a degree that I can then further at another college. I'm still not 100% sure what I want to further my degree to but thanks to CCV's broad liberal studies degree, I have some time to figure it out. I came into CCV unsure of how successful I was going to be. I had been a decent student in high school, all A's and B's aside from the occasional C. I felt as if college was going to be stressful and overwhelming and that I was not going to be able to be successful. Boy was I wrong! I came in the first day and had a class with the name of Race, Ethnicity, Class, and Gender. I knew that I was going to be interested in the class but as it turns out, I was even more interested in the teacher. She was very cultured and caring. Mrs. McHardy was very sweet and I shared some things with her that I wouldn't share with just anyone. She was very trust worthy and I felt that she was very professional and confidential. The class environment was really great and I succeeded in all of my classes. I was very worried about not succeeding yet I received a 4.0 gpa and a spot on the presidents honors list.
